Spam Poetry

Juri Nummelin

Abraxas
Turku 2004

THIS IS a collection of spam poetry that takes the elements inherent in spam mail - dadaism, nihilism, sexism, chauvinism, violence – and uses them either by rearranging the elements in the messages themselves or using them as such, intact. There are some poems included that have been made with the help of a internet search machine. In those I've included several arbitrary bits of texts found in the net in the poems. One or two poems of this collection have been made with the help of cut-up machines that are widely available in the net.

Many thanks to John Boston and other members of the Fictionmags group.

Whether this failure is from a lack of information, scholarship ability, or honesty is unimportant. What is important is that historical information be made freely available and gathered into exhibits that allow researchers to derive independent conclusions from the relatively well preserved writings of this time period.

Throughout the Rambo saga, John Rambo has represented the lone soldier; the commando, the guerilla. Rambo, a perfect specimen of a finely tuned machine in Vietnam, finds that life back in the States after the war is very different. This lone soldier exists without war or battle.

When a child develops a strong sense of self-awareness and inner strength, they are able to resist peer pressure including drug and alcohol use and involvement in gangs.

Conclusion:

He was a sharp businessman who had spent his time, when not building up his contracting company, hosting elaborate street parties for friends and neighbors, dressing as a clown and entertaining children at local hospitals and immersing himself in organizations such as the Jaycees, working to make his community a better place to live.
